NEW HISTORICISM

According to author and critic Kristi Siegel, New Criticism's formalist, exclusionary approach to analyzing literature spawned the reactionary theory of New Historicism, which offered a theoretical approach skeptical of the inherent subjectivity of historical narratives. New Historicism emerged in the late 1970's and early 80's, differentiating itself from traditional biographical historicism, in which "literature was seen as a (mimetic) reflection of the historical world in which it was produced. Further, history was viewed as stable, linear, and recoverable—a narrative of fact." Additional evidence of New Historicism's differentiation from other critical theories is the integration and consideration of "cultural, social, political, and anthropological discourses at work in any given age." This inclusive approach to other disciplines also closely links and intertwines New Historicism with Cultural Materialism and Cultural Studies.

KEY TERMS

Thick description – Developed by Clifford Geertz in The Interpretation of Cultures: Selected Essays (1983), it's "the close analysis, or 'reading,' of a particular social production or event so as to recover the meanings it has for the people involved in it, as well as to discover, within the overall cultural system, the network of conventions, codes, and modes of thinking with which the particular item is implicated, and which invest the item with those meanings" (qtd. in Abrams 191).
